

Where would it be the best place for brazilians to live abroad?

Emanuel Monção Lima

April 17, 2020

1. Introduction

1.1 Background

A 24-years brazilian military government has come to an end followed by an enormous financial crisis which has forced the country to change its currency for the eighth time within 42 years, and so its economic model in the 80s and 90s. The move to the new currency (BRL) now attached to american dollar (USD) appears to be one of the most successful currency changes of the recent time and has made Brazilian economy be in spotlights again.

Nevertheless, with more freedom to come and go and a better financial conditions Brazilians still have got some issues related to public administration which seems that is possible to lead the country to some kind of financial, security or political crisis in anytime. This leads to a sort of tension and uncertainty mostly due to a trauma caused by several mistakes made by governments since just after World War II time but having critically collapsed back in the 90's. All of these combined have made some people try on new lives and experiences in another country.

1.2 Problem

The project has the idea of tracking and mapping best places in the world that might have familiar attributes to those Brazilians who wonder to move to another country someday in a near future based on choices of people that have already moved out and on Brazilian-related places and communities in the neighborhoods so newcomers may feel more comfortable at first.

1.3 Interest

This might be individually interesting for those who might want to move to another country and have not decided where to or want to check some information out first before making such a big move. Also might be interesting to some exchange agencies which aim to customize their packages depending on their customers' wishes since this report takes some parameters in consideration but are totally up to customizing though.